Interim Report

APRIL - JUNE

Q2

Market analysis

Generally

In the second guarter of 2025, the global economy exhibited a complex landscape characterized by both resilience and challenges. Inflationary pressures persisted in major economies, particularly in the United States and the Eurozone, where central banks maintained a cautious stance on interest rates after a series of hikes in the previous year. Inflation rates showed signs of stabilizing but remained higher than desired, prompting ongoing debates about the effectiveness of monetary policy.

Global stock markets experienced heightened volatility. While technology stocks rebounded due to robust advancements in artificial intelligence and digital innovation, traditional sectors faced headwinds from rising costs and supply chain disruptions. Investor sentiment was influenced by various factors, including earnings reports, inflation data, and geopolitical developments, particularly tensions in Eastern Europe and trade discussions involving China.

Overall, while the outlook for the Global economy in Q2 2025 indicated growth potential, underlying uncertainties and inflation concerns continued to shape market dynamics. The emphasis was on navigating these complexities to foster sustainable growth.

In the second quarter of 2025, Sweden's economy demonstrated a moderate recovery amid global economic fluctuations and persistent inflationary pressures. GDP growth remained steady, supported by robust consumer spending and a resilient labor market. However, inflation continued to pose challenges, primarily driven by rising energy costs and supply chain disruptions, leading the Swedish Central Bank to adopt a cautious approach to monetary policy. The Swedish Central Bank decided to make another cut during the second quarter 2025, the cut was 0,25 percent and the current rate is 2,0%. The Swedish Central Banks inflation target of 2% was met.

The Swedish Krona experienced some volatility against major currencies, reflecting both domestic economic conditions and broader global trends. The central bank maintained a focus on inflation control while contemplating the timing of future interest rate adjustments.

In the equity markets, Swedish companies generally performed well, particularly in technology and green energy sectors, as the country continued to emphasize sustainability and innovation. Industrials and consumer goods faced mixed results, impacted by global demand fluctuations and cost pressures. The government's ongoing investments in infrastructure and sustainability initiatives aimed to bolster long-term growth and address climate challenges.

Overall, while the Swedish economy showed resilience in Q2 2025, balancing inflation control and growth remained key themes, influencing market dynamics and policymaking.

The Real Estate Market

In the second quarter of 2025, the Swedish commercial real estate market faced a mixed trajectory amid evolving economic conditions and shifting demand patterns. While the office sector experienced some challenges due to the ongoing adoption of hybrid work models, which reduced the need for traditional office spaces, high-quality and flexible office environments remained in demand, particularly in urban areas like Stockholm, Gothenburg and Malmö.

The industrial and logistics segments, however, showed resilience, benefiting from the continued growth of e-commerce and the need for efficient supply chain solutions. As a result, demand for warehouses, distribution spaces and light industry facilities remained strong, with rising rental rates in these sectors.

The real estate sector continues to focus on liquidity, and refinancing remains the major subject. Sweden's real estate market began to stabilize in 2024, with total transaction volumes reaching 140 billion SEK, a 35% increase compared to 2023. While the recovery is notable, volumes remain roughly 30% below the historical average for 2015–2023. The market still faces headwinds, including financing constraints and mismatches in buyer-seller expectations.

Sustainability continued to drive investment decisions, as more investors sought properties that met green building standards. Overall, the Swedish commercial real estate market in Q2 2025 was characterized by diversity in performance across sectors, with a clear tilt towards adaptability and sustainability as key themes shaping future growth.
